Pro Forma Window Consultation

Morningstar Indexes is considering extending the pro forma window for equity index reconstitutions and rebalances to seven days (excluding weekends) from five days. Consistent with the current practice, this window would be based on a global calendar, which does not account for holidays. This extension is intended to provide more advance notice of upcoming changes, making the indexes easier to replicate and providing more time to work around local market holidays. Under this proposal, the reconstitution and rebalance effective dates would not change, nor would the reference dates for the data inputs, with the following exceptions:

- The price reference date used to set index shares would move to the Monday before the second Friday of the reconstitution/rebalance month from the Wednesday before the second Friday.
- The reference date for the Morningstar Economic Moat Rating and price/fair value inputs (where applicable) used in the Morningstar Moat Indexes listed here would move to the close of the first Friday of the reconstitution month from the Tuesday before the second Friday.
- The Morningstar Rating reference date used for the Morningstar US Dividend Valuation Index would move to the close of the first Friday of the reconstitution month from the Tuesday before the second Friday.

These changes are expected to have minimal impact on the composition of the index portfolios.

While longer pro forma windows were considered, a longer extension would likely require more significant methodology changes and a longer lag between the reference and effective dates, as many fundamental data inputs are only updated monthly.

To align with a potentially extended reconstitution pro forma period, we are also considering extending the daily pro forma window to (T+2 to T+7) from (T+2 to T+6) calendar days.

We are soliciting client feedback on this proposal.
